

Unveiling the Enigma: "The Emperor Nicholas II As I Knew Him"

OCTOBER 1914

He welcomed me as representing the British army in Russia, and asked a great many questions about the troops in France and about the Indian contingents, in which he was much interested.

We talked freely and pleasantly for some twenty minutes, after which he invited me to dinner, telling me to be sure to dispense with my sword, in which I was of course arrayed for this formal presentation.

The first impression left upon my mind was absolutely different from any that I had expected. I had always pictured him to myself as a somewhat sad and anxious-looking monarch, with cares of state and other things hanging heavily over him. Instead of that I found a bright, keen, happy face, plenty of humour and a 'fresh-air man.'

In the evening off in my newest suit of khaki to dinner. About sixteen of us in all—the two Grand Dukes, Nicholas and Peter, C.G.S., Q.M.G., the chaplain (Father George), La Guiche, the French Military Attaché, etc., and myself.

The usual zakouska to begin with, followed by a very simple dinner, soup, fish, roast beef and Yorkshire pudding, soufflé and fruit, with kvass and light wines.
